The house was designed for a family with teenage children. It is characterized by geometric facade. The soft lines in the front of the house create an inviting lobby, the living room on contrary is a large framework, but they both are part of the same mass. The front wall that penetrates into the house continues the flow from outside towards the roof and the overall structure.

The shape of the living room is a sunrise portal, and then sunlight washes the house in a planned order: first the east wing – public space, master bedroom and swimming pool, and only then the west wing – bedrooms and family room. The house has water recycling system, insulation and solar roof according to green standards. The main colors, shades of white, provide an airy and light feeling, and the selected materials enhance the sense of space. Light colored porcelain granite tiles, which reflect the natural light, and the use of glass, including in stair rails, all contribute to transparency.

The top floor is a private area with family bedrooms. It includes the master bedroom, an intimate family room, three children bedrooms, children's bathroom, a laundry room with a balcony and a gallery. The roof is divided into two parts: one part contains solar panels, while the other part serves as another hosting area equipped with garden furniture. In addition to two floors, the house includes a basement that has several uses: the home office of the father, a game hall, a home theater and a bedroom located in the safe room (MAMAD). The basement has three windows overlooking to the pool.
